Precisely; there is no reason to suppose that the grain of any species of wood has differed from its progenitors. From the descriptions we have of Roman houses, they must have been very elegant. The Romans imported all they chose, or could afford, from conquered nations. But you know Tyre possessed similar magnificence in the time of Ezekiel, till it was destroyed by Alexander the Great. Indeed, perhaps Tyre suggested some of those very luxuries which were spread abroad after his death. The Chinese boast of four evidences of early civilization: that they sat on chairs, ate off tables, burned wax candles, and clothed the whole body, long before such tilings were customary elsewhere; and when we see their beautiful inlaid cabinets and tables; porcelain vases, cups and saucers; ivory fans, and toys of elaborate carving, with the weaving and embroidery they produce by the most tedious and clumsy methods, it is very easy to believe that art has been in its present condition among them for ages. The houses of ancient Rome, with all these adorn ings, must have been very imposing. Indeed, in many things Europeans have as yet failed to compete with them. Pray what can they do better than we can, mamma? asked Harold, somewhat anxiously. Their horn lanterns are greatly superior to any that have been made in other countries; their gongs cannot be produced in Europe; their vermilion...
