Excerpt: . . . could so soon be found for the difficulty that had appeared insurmountable only an hour before. Here was a way by which her mother would be relieved from anxiety as to her future home; she herself would be enabled to perform a daughters part towards her beloved parent, and Madame Dervilles burden of care and toil would be shared and lightened. Madame Pierard was a good woman: during her married life she had become accustomed to yield unquestioning submission to a rather domineering and obstinate husband; but she was given to fret about little things, had a great many small manias of her own, and was, unfortunately, addicted to disagreeing with all her three sons-in-law. Madame Andre was fully aware of her mothers weak points, and did not fail to ask herself whether it would be possible for her to live amicably with Madame Derville,...
